

CareerPassport — Website Narrative & Product Brief

Purpose of this document

This document is intended to give the website designer a clear understanding of what CareerPassport is, why it exists, how it works at a conceptual level, and what a professional should feel after experiencing the website.

It deliberately does not prescribe colours, typography, layouts, visual systems, or interaction patterns. Those decisions should remain with the designer.

The goal is to provide the strategic and emotional foundation from which the website can be designed.

1. What CareerPassport believes

CareerPassport begins with a simple belief:

A professional should be understood by more than what they claim about themselves.

Titles, résumés, profiles and skill labels are useful, but they are incomplete.

What makes someone capable is the collection of experiences they have lived through:

the problems they have solved,

the work they have created,

the situations they have navigated,

the decisions they have made,

the environments they have operated in,

the things they have learned,

and the evidence those experiences have left behind.

Over time, those experiences shape the professional.

CareerPassport exists to help people preserve that journey and allow the world to understand them through more than a list of assertions.

The underlying philosophy is not:

“Build a better résumé.”

It is:

Let what you have lived reveal what you are capable of.

2. Why CareerPassport should exist

A career is one of the longest journeys a person undertakes

Yet people usually document it only at isolated moments.

They work for years.

They learn continuously.

They solve difficult problems.

They take on responsibilities outside their formal role.

They build things.

They receive feedback.

They develop new capabilities.

They experience successes and failures that change the way they operate.

And then, when an opportunity appears, they are expected to reconstruct all of that into a résumé or a professional profile.

Much of the real journey has already disappeared.

CareerPassport is designed around a different idea:

your professional identity should grow while your career is happening.

It should not have to be rebuilt every time you decide to look for something new.

CareerPassport gives professionals a place where their experiences can accumulate, acquire context and eventually become meaningful evidence of what they can do.

3. Who CareerPassport is for

The initial professional CareerPassport should speak most strongly to is an ambitious professional approximately two to five years into their career.

They are no longer starting from zero.

They have real experiences.

They are learning continuously.

Their capabilities are often developing faster than their title or résumé suggests.

They may be building side projects, learning new tools, taking on responsibilities informally, writing, contributing, solving problems, experimenting or developing specialist expertise.

They are beginning to think more deliberately about what comes next.

But their professional identity is fragmented across many places and often fails to represent how much they have actually grown.

CareerPassport should create the feeling:

“There is more to me than what my current profile communicates.”

And then:

“This gives me a way to build that fuller version of myself over time.”

CareerPassport should feel aspirational rather than mass-market.

It is a professional identity for people who care about where their career is going and want to take greater ownership of how they build it.

4. CareerPassport is not another profile

CareerPassport should not be understood as another place where someone fills in:

Name.

Job title.

Company.

Education.

Skills.

About me.

That would reduce the product to another professional profile.

CareerPassport is closer to a living record of professional becoming.

It gets richer because the professional gets richer.

An experience adds context.

A project adds evidence.

A conversation reveals something that had not been articulated before.

A company or university gives part of the journey provenance.

A demonstrated capability earns stronger credibility.

Over time, the Passport becomes a more meaningful representation of the individual carrying it.

Traditional profiles are primarily filled in.

A CareerPassport should feel as though it is built through experience.

5. How the CareerPassport begins

A professional should not need to start from a blank page.

CareerPassport begins by learning from the professional's existing world.

That could include:

- their résumé,
- LinkedIn,
- GitHub,
- Medium,
- Substack,
- documents,
- presentations,
- demos,
- videos,
- certificates,
- portfolios,
- and other professional resources they choose to connect.

The purpose is not simply to aggregate information.

The important thing is what happens once these fragments begin to connect.

A project mentioned on a résumé may correspond to work found elsewhere.

A GitHub repository may provide evidence behind a capability.

A presentation may demonstrate how the person thinks.

A document may reveal ownership that a job title never captured.

CareerPassport starts to build continuity between experiences that currently live in different places.

The result is the beginning of a professional memory.

6. The Companion sits at the heart of the product

The Companion is a central part of CareerPassport.

It should not be understood merely as an AI assistant or chatbot.

It is the ongoing interface between the professional and their evolving CareerPassport.

The professional should be able to return to it naturally and talk.

They may talk about:

something they recently worked on,

a difficult situation they encountered,

something they learned,

a project they completed,

a piece of feedback,

a responsibility they took on,

a capability they believe they possess, or something they are considering doing next.

The Companion listens.

It remembers the broader context.

It asks questions.

It nudges when something appears worth exploring further.

It helps the professional articulate experiences that may otherwise remain vague or forgotten.

The relationship should feel less like filling out a form and more like having a thoughtful presence alongside the career journey.

The Companion should not tell the user who they are.

It should help them notice what their own experiences are revealing about them.

7. From conversation to evidence

An important distinction in CareerPassport is that conversation alone does not automatically become proof.

A professional may say:

"I am good at product strategy."

"I have strong stakeholder-management skills."

"I can operate in ambiguous environments."

"I have deep expertise in a particular technology."

Those statements are useful starting points.

But CareerPassport should not simply convert them into polished claims and place them on a profile.

The Companion can explore the statement through conversation.

It can understand the context.

It can ask what the professional actually did.

It can identify which experiences may support the claim.

As enough context develops, CareerPassport can suggest a more deliberate way for the professional to demonstrate the capability.

This is where CareerPassport moves from professional storytelling into professional evidence.

8. Curated journeys turn potential claims into demonstrated capability

When CareerPassport sees that an experience or claimed capability could be meaningfully demonstrated, it can create or recommend a curated journey for the professional.

The professional may have several possible journeys to choose from.

The purpose of the journey is not to make them complete arbitrary tests

It is to create a structured opportunity to reveal the depth of capability that may already exist because of the experiences they have lived.

A journey might ask the professional to:

create something,

solve something,

explain a decision,

respond to a realistic scenario,

reflect on prior work,

present evidence,

produce an artifact,

or demonstrate how they would approach a relevant problem.

The journey therefore becomes a bridge between:

"I say I can do this."

and

"Here is evidence of how deeply I can actually do it."

That transition is fundamental to CareerPassport.

9. Artifacts are the raw evidence of professional capability

The output of these journeys should not merely be another score.

They create artifacts.

An artifact could represent someone's thinking, work, reasoning, decisions, process, analysis or execution.

These artifacts form an evidence layer behind the professional identity.

Some may ultimately be visible.

Some may remain private.

Some may support a particular claim.

Some may become part of a future viewing lens.

Some may simply remain in the professional's artifact library as part of their history.

This creates an important distinction.

CareerPassport should not only say:

"This person has this capability."

It should increasingly be able to answer:

"What makes us believe that?"

10. Stamps make depth visible

Stamps should be one of CareerPassport's most distinctive mechanisms.

A Stamp is not a participation badge.

It is not something everyone automatically receives.

And all Stamps should not carry the same meaning.

A Stamp represents the depth of capability demonstrated within the context of a particular experience or journey.

A professional may claim a skill.

They may discuss relevant experiences with the Companion.

They may undertake a curated journey.

They may produce evidence.

That evidence can then be evaluated against the depth expected.

Only after that process should CareerPassport determine whether a Stamp is earned and what level of Stamp is appropriate.

The product may eventually have several classes or levels of Stamp.

The exact underlying methodology does not need to be explained on the main website.

What matters is that the visitor understands the principle:

A Stamp is earned by demonstrating depth, not by selecting a skill from a list.

That makes it a meaningful professional signal.

11. A Stamp should answer a better question than “Does this person have this skill?”

Traditional professional platforms tend to reduce capability to yes or no.

Does this person know Python?

Leadership?

Strategy?

Marketing?

Design?

But capability has depth.

Two people may both say they possess the same skill while having profoundly different levels of experience.

The more useful question is:

What has this person actually been able to do with that capability, and under what level of complexity?

CareerPassport should help make that difference visible.

The user viewing the Passport should not need to understand the internal evaluation model.

They should simply feel:

“I have stronger reasons to trust this capability because I can see what sits behind it.”

This is where Stamps become valuable.

They compress a much richer evidence process into a signal that is easy to understand and easy for the professional to carry forward.

12. Visas and Stamps tell different parts of the journey

These concepts should remain clearly distinct.

Visas provide provenance

A Visa represents an association with an institution or organisation that formed part of the professional's journey.

A university.

An employer.

A fellowship.

A programme.

A professional institution.

It helps answer:

Where did this part of the journey happen?

It gives the experience provenance.

Stamps reveal depth

A Stamp speaks to what the professional demonstrated through that experience.

It helps answer:

What did this person become capable of while living through it?

Visas therefore anchor the journey.

Stamps reveal what was developed and demonstrated along the way.

Together they create something much richer than a conventional employment-history section.

13. Trust should accumulate

CareerPassport should not operate on the simplistic idea that information is either “verified” or “unverified.”

There are different levels of provenance and confidence.

Something may initially come directly from the professional.

That still matters.

A connected source may provide supporting evidence.

A curated journey may produce additional evidence.

An evaluation may establish stronger confidence.

An organisation may eventually confirm or issue part of the record directly.

Trust therefore accumulates around an experience.

CareerPassport should make the origins and strength of evidence increasingly legible without implying that only institution-issued information is meaningful.

This allows the Passport to become more trusted as the professional continues building it.

14. The CareerPassport loop

At its most fundamental level, CareerPassport should operate as a continuous loop.

The professional first brings in the professional memory they already have.

They then continue living their career.

They talk to the Companion.

The Companion listens, remembers, asks and nudges.

Interesting experiences and capabilities begin to emerge from those conversations.

CareerPassport helps the professional explore them.

Where appropriate, it proposes ways of demonstrating them.

The professional undertakes curated journeys.

Those journeys create evidence.

The evidence can establish stronger claims.

Meaningful depth can result in a Stamp.

That Stamp and its supporting evidence can become part of the CareerPassport.

Then the professional continues living.

And the cycle begins again.

The CareerPassport therefore does not become "finished."

It grows with the person.

This continuous loop is the functional expression of the larger philosophical idea behind the product.

15. The Passport is the outcome, not the starting point

The public CareerPassport is what other people ultimately encounter.

But the visible Passport should feel like the consequence of a much deeper process.

Behind it may sit:

conversations,

connected resources,

raw experiences,

evidence,

artifacts,

journeys,

Visas,

Stamps,

and a growing understanding of the professional.

The public Passport should therefore feel unusually rich without requiring the viewer to see everything that exists underneath it.

This depth is what should make the Passport feel substantially different from a conventional profile.

16. One professional identity can have different viewing lenses

There should not be one mandatory public version of a professional.

Different situations require different perspectives.

A company hiring for a particular role may need one lens.

A founder searching for a co-founder may need another.

Someone exploring collaboration may care about a different combination of experiences.

A professional community may be interested in something else again.

CareerPassport should allow the professional to determine which parts of their identity are relevant to each context.

The underlying person remains the same.

The Passport remains theirs.

But the lens through which another person sees that Passport can change.

This creates a much more human way of representing professional identity.

It also gives the professional meaningful control over:

what is visible,

what is emphasised,

what remains private,

and which evidence is made available.

CareerPassport should therefore feel like a platform that gives professionals greater authorship over how they are understood, rather than one that asks them to expose more information publicly.

17. The professional should always retain ownership

CareerPassport is not designed around extracting professional information from users so that the platform can own the relationship.

The professional identity belongs to the professional.

The user should decide what they want to capture.

They should decide what they want to share.

They should decide who can see deeper information.

They should decide which representation of themselves is appropriate for a particular context.

Personal information should not become public merely because it exists within CareerPassport.

This sense of ownership is fundamental to the product proposition.

18. CareerPassport should create relief

There is a practical emotional benefit that the website should communicate strongly.

Professionals should no longer have to rediscover their own career every time an opportunity appears.

They should not need to remember every meaningful thing they did over the previous two years.

They should not have to search through old folders, Slack messages, project documents and GitHub repositories just to reconstruct a story.

They should not need to manufacture a professional narrative at the moment when they need one most.

CareerPassport should have been helping them preserve it all along.

That should create a genuine sense of relief:

“I finally have somewhere for all of this to live.”

19. CareerPassport should also create pride

Relief gets the professional interested.

Pride should make them want to own the product.

As their Passport develops, the professional should begin to see the accumulated evidence of how far they have travelled.

Experiences that once felt disconnected start making sense together.

Capabilities they took for granted become visible.

Work that would otherwise have disappeared becomes part of their story.

Associations acquire provenance.

Demonstrated depth earns stronger signals.

The professional should gradually feel that the Passport represents them in a way that a conventional résumé never has.

They should want to share it.

They should want their name attached to it.

They should feel:

“This is a representation of my career that I am proud to carry.”

20. Opportunity is an outcome of being understood better

CareerPassport should not position itself primarily as another job-search destination.

Opportunity comes downstream of understanding.

If the Passport contains a richer picture of:

what someone has experienced,

what they have demonstrated,

where their real depth lies,

what they care about,

and what they want next,

then the right opportunities can be matched to them more intelligently.

CareerPassport's connection to companies and recruitment partners matters because the professional identity does not exist in isolation.

There is an ecosystem on the other side capable of discovering and understanding it.

The emotional promise should therefore not simply be:

Find more jobs.

It should feel closer to:

Be represented well enough that better opportunities can recognise why you matter.

21. CareerPassport should prepare professionals for an agentic world

There is also an important future-facing benefit.

Opportunity discovery will increasingly be performed not only by humans but by intelligent systems acting on behalf of companies, recruiters, founders and professionals.

In that world, a résumé containing disconnected keywords is an increasingly weak representation of a person.

A rich, structured, evidence-backed professional identity can be understood much more effectively.

CareerPassport should therefore make professionals easier for both humans and intelligent agents to understand and discover.

This is an important product advantage.

But it should remain secondary to the deeper human proposition.

CareerPassport is not valuable because AI exists.

It is valuable because people deserve to be represented more completely.

The changing technological landscape simply makes that representation even more important.

22. What CareerPassport should not become on the website

The product contains a large number of capabilities.

The website should resist the temptation to explain all of them with equal importance.

CareerPassport should not appear to be:

- another résumé builder,
- another portfolio tool,
- another LinkedIn alternative,
- another job board,
- another AI chatbot,
- another assessment platform,
- another credential marketplace,
- or a collection of unrelated AI features.

Resume generation, portfolios and other output formats may exist within the ecosystem.

But they are not the central idea.

The central idea is the continuously developing professional identity underneath them.

Everything else should feel like a consequence of that.

23. What the website needs to make concrete

Although the website should carry a strong philosophy, it cannot remain purely philosophical.

The visitor must be able to understand that there is a real product mechanism underneath the idea.

At some point in the experience, they should understand that CareerPassport can:

bring together what already exists → develop memory → converse with them → uncover meaningful experiences → help them demonstrate capability → create evidence → evaluate depth → earn trusted signals → build a richer Passport.

This does not necessarily need to be explained through technical language.

It does need to feel real.

The professional should leave understanding that CareerPassport is not merely going to write a more inspiring description of them.

It is designed to help them build evidence for the professional they are becoming.

24. The feeling the website must leave behind

The final test of the professional website is not whether the visitor remembers every feature.

The test is what they believe about themselves after going through it.

Ideally, the visitor should arrive thinking:

“I have a résumé and a LinkedIn profile. Why would I need something else?”

And leave thinking:

“Those things do not really capture everything I have become.”

They should recognise that much of their professional value currently exists only in memory.

They should see that their experiences could become evidence.

They should understand that capabilities can have depth rather than simply labels.

They should imagine a Passport that becomes more meaningful as their career grows.

They should feel ownership over how they are seen.

They should recognise that this could prepare them for opportunities before they even start searching for them.

Most importantly, they should feel:

“I want to start building this now.”

25. The conversion objective

At launch, the primary objective of the professional website is to create enough desire and belief that the visitor chooses to join the early community.

“Join the waitlist” can communicate availability.

But the stronger emotional action is ownership.

The website should therefore make the idea of reserving a CareerPassport identity feel meaningful.

For example:

Reserve your CareerPassport

or

Reserve your Passport handle

The visitor should feel they are doing more than registering interest in upcoming software.

They are claiming the beginning of an identity that can stay with them throughout their professional life.

26. The essence of CareerPassport

CareerPassport exists because careers are lived in much greater detail than they are currently represented.

People accumulate experiences for years, while the professional world reduces those experiences to titles, bullet points and claims.

CareerPassport gives the professional a place to preserve that journey as it happens.

The Companion helps uncover what matters.

Curated journeys create opportunities to demonstrate capability.

Artifacts provide evidence.

Visas give experiences provenance.

Stamps make demonstrated depth visible.

The Passport brings those pieces together into an identity that can evolve throughout a career.

The professional controls how that identity is seen.

And when opportunities appear, they no longer need to reconstruct their potential from scratch.

They already have something capable of speaking for them.

The central ambition of CareerPassport is therefore not simply to help people describe themselves better.

It is to help professionals build a body of evidence around the person they are becoming — and give them a way to carry that identity confidently into whatever comes next.

Because the strongest professional identity should not be built from what you say about yourself. It should emerge from what your journey can show.
